

It should be government policy to insure that full bandwidth internet is available all over HK - which means New Territories, Outlying Islands, everywhere. This has been government policy in many other countries, such as the UK and Japan for years, with the result that they have fibre optic connections in every little village, whereas in HK (because the private sector that provides the services is not mandated to improve them) we have 1950's twisted copper.

Peter Millward